

End-Point Assessment for

ST0430 Regulatory Compliance Officer

Level 4 V1.2

Working as a regulatory compliance officer

The broad purpose of the occupation is to perform various regulatory compliance functions, support businesses and individuals to comply with relevant legal, regulatory and organisational requirements, identify risks which may result in non-compliance by businesses or individuals and assist in further developing policies and procedures to mitigate any identified risks. Individuals should be excellent communicators providing clear advice and guidance and have the ability to work independently, taking responsibility for their own caseload and responsibilities.

The occupation is found in compliance functions of small, medium, large and multinational organisations. These organisations work in private, public and third sectors including Government departments, local authorities, environmental health, gambling and licencing, health and social care organisations, retail, education institutions and charities. The occupation is also found in national regulators such as the Food Standards Agency (FSA), Health and Safety Executive (HSE), Office for Product Safety and Standards (OPSS) or Environment Agency.
