The Short, the Long and the Tall

had faded. But two more divorce settlements would sort that out. With this in mind, Consuela estimated that she only had another five years before the final vow must be taken.

The Rosenheims flew into London from their home in New York – or, to be more accurate, from their homes in New York. Consuela had travelled to the airport by chauffeur-driven car from their mansion in the Hamptons, while her husband had been taken from his Wall Street office in a second chauffeur-driven car. They met up in the Concorde lounge at JFK. When they had landed at Heathrow another limousine transported them to the Ritz, where they were escorted to their usual suite without any suggestion of having to sign forms or book in.

The purpose of their trip was twofold. Mr Rosenheim was hoping to take over a small merchant bank that had not benefited from the recession, while Mrs Rosenheim intended to occupy her time looking for a suitable birthday present – for herself. Despite considerable research I have been unable to discover exactly which birthday Consuela would officially be celebrating.

After a sleepless night induced by jetlag, Victor Rosenheim was whisked away to an early-morning meeting in the City, while Consuela remained in bed toying with her breakfast. She managed one piece of thin unbuttered toast and a stab at a boiled egg.

Once the breakfast tray had been removed, Consuela made a couple of phone calls to confirm luncheon dates for the two days she would be in London. She then disappeared into the bathroom.

Fifty minutes later she emerged from her suite dressed in a pink Olagane suit with a dark blue collar, her fair hair bouncing on her shoulders. Few of the men she passed between the elevator and the revolving doors failed to turn their heads, so Consuela judged that the previous fifty minutes had not been wasted. She stepped out of the hotel and into the morning sun to begin her search for the birthday present.

Moon sand

WHAT YOU WILL NEED

2 cups plain flour
Large mixing bowl
60ml cooking oil
Tray
Cups/cookie cutters (optional)

POTENTIAL FOR MESS

I would be lying if I said this was mess-free. My husband took one look at our daughter playing with moon sand and opted out of this one!

PARENTAL ENJOYMENT

This depends on the parent! If you are someone who does NOT like sand (i.e. 'I am a pool person, not a beach person'), this probably isn't the activity for you.

ENGAGED FOR

5 minutes to make, 25-45 minutes of messy play.

GOOD STUFF

METHOD

Before settling on this 'kitchen pantry' recipe I had tried twice to make mouldable sand with my daughter, using actual sand. However, I couldn't succeed (and so it is still a work in progress); it was either too solid or too sludgy and I didn't find sand itself that easy to acquire in a small quantity. I am sure my husband (who hates sand) will think of this quite differently, but I felt we'd really made a fantastic breakthrough when I discovered that flour can be mixed with oil to basically create the exact same effect.

Put the flour into a large mixing bowl, pour in the oil and get your toddler mixing it with their hands (think 'apple crumble topping'-style mixing), rubbing it between fingertips up high, so it falls back into the bowl and forms sandy coloured thin breadcrumbs.

Keep going until it's almost like sand, then, if you are ready for it, tip it out onto a tray. Add fun things at this point like little cups to fill and tip upside down like sandcastles, or shaped cookie cutters – you can use your imagination here to see what tools are around your kitchen. This has the potential to be a fantastically focused activity; it was incredibly fun for Mabel and I was thrilled that flour and oil had created this magical assortment of sandy shapes.

However, the excitement the first time we tried this did go a little OTT and Mabel must have confused my instruction of 'mix the sand like it is crumble' as 'eat this utterly delicious apple crumble', because great handfuls of the stuff was being consumed at an almighty rate – which is when sand-phobic Dad walked in and declared this is a horrible activity and winced at the idea that she might be chewing on actual grains of stone from the Southern Coastline.

Once cleared up (and all it actually took was to scrape it back into the tray, turning a blind eye to the

Beyond that he could see, at the end of a roughly paved path, a small rustic dwelling hugging the roots of the trees.

His bag had absorbed the worst of his fall. The land was silent, the day was fading to a warm russet. He had little idea how long he'd been lying there. Above, the Visage hung in its crescent phase, faded to a pale amber through layers of atmosphere. A smaller inset crescent was visible where the light caught the lip of an eye socket. What strange offcast of the gods might have fallen to earth this day? If the Visage knew, it was not telling.

Rising painfully to his hooves, he could see the tops of trees several fields away were on fire. A fine aerated mist of dirt and vegetable matter masked the point of impact, but was beginning to dissipate to the south.

Redoubling his efforts, he climbed a low stone wall and jumped a ditch in which a muddy stream flowed. Ahead high stands of frax ran in neat rows, and he picked a gap between them.

At the far side of the field, he forced his way through a thick hedgerow that further shredded the lining of his jacket.

There it was. The landing site.

A straight line of elongated pockmarks crossed an otherwise empty field, ending in one large final crater banked with an enormous horseshoe of fresh earth. The Celestial Mechanic stumbled through the dirt, around the smaller trailing craters, and approached the largest.

The earth was soft and yielding. As he approached it began to subside underneath him, and he had to crawl the last short distance to the edge to avoid falling in.

He raised an eye over the top. He could see a neat inverted cone of fresh dirt, some fifteen paces across, in the centre of which infalling material had formed a small stubby version of the Spire. He pulled himself up to get a better view. Under his feet, a slurry of small particles began to cascade inward and he sat down hard, bracing himself.

Where was it? He couldn't see anything but freshly turned dirt, shredded roots and foliage.

No meteorite.

He let his senses drift beneath the surface. Disturbed sediment, plant remains, rocks, clay . . . could it have evaporated on impact? No. Whatever had been here, it had gone.

On the far side, something caught his attention.

He carefully circumnavigated the crater. A section of the dirt bank had been scooped out by the passage of something large. Something heavy. Around this was a jumble of footprints, pressed deep into the loose earth. Just outside the lip, a length of stout rope lay beside an area which looked like it had been trampled flat by a packbeast. His packbeast, he now had no doubt, had been used to pull whatever had landed here today up, out, and away.

The trail was not hard to follow. Several fields distant, the Celestial Mechanic could see smoke rising in a thin plume. A farmstead. The tracks led straight towards it.

DECIDING THAT in his current state a degree of caution would be advisable, he skirted the property. An orchard gave onto a garden, and beyond that he could see, at the end of a roughly paved path, a small

Location <sup>[edit]</sup>

Daedalus is a prominent crater located near the centre of the far side of the Moon, named after the Daedalus of Greek myth, a skilled craftsman and artist who constructed the wings for his son, Icarus. <sup>[6]</sup>

It was first photographed by the Apollo 11 astronauts during circumlunar orbit <sup>[7]</sup>, and originally named "Crater 308", a temporary IAU designation that preceded the establishment of official far-side lunar nomenclature. <sup>[8]</sup> A terraced inner wall surrounds a cluster of central peaks and a relatively flat floor. Because of its location on the lunar far side, shielded from radio emissions from the Earth, it has been proposed as the site for a giant radio telescope which would be formed from the natural curvature of the crater itself, following the same principles as the Arecibo <sup>[22]</sup> radio telescope in Puerto Rico, but on a vastly larger scale. As of the time of writing, there has been no public funding available to build such a telescope, though detailed proposals have been prepared by two NASA subcontractors, <sup>[25]</sup> and rumours persist that a privately-funded base does indeed exist, with either NASA, the UKSA (United Kingdom Space Agency), ESA and/or the Russian space agency Roscosmos' knowledge or explicit co-operation.

It is at, or close to, this location that the footage is alleged to have been shot. <sup>[9]</sup>

Format <sup>[edit]</sup>

The footage is a 4 minute, 16 second MPEG-4 digital file. Though carrying a stereo encoding, the two sound channels are identical, effectively rendering the audio mono. The pixel ratio of the image is small at 320x240, cited as supportive of the proposed helmet camera ("helmet cam") origin. The file size is 14.6 megabytes. <sup>[10]</sup>

Reception <sup>[edit]</sup>

Readers of online forum The New Fortean Bulletin voted the Daedalus Footage as "the best available photographic evidence of what is the Holy Grail of anomalous research - indisputable evidence of an encounter with an extraterrestrial biological entity". <sup>[11]</sup>

Conspirasphere called it "perhaps the single most important visual record in the field of ufology". <sup>[12]</sup>

Authenticity <sup>[edit]</sup>

Some researchers have claimed that the extant version of the Daedalus Footage is not authentic, or at least not the original version as purportedly shot. According to controversial <sup>[citation needed]</sup> blogger James Hartland, the film was "originally touted by the vast majority of conspiracy theorists as incontrovertible proof" but is now believed by many researchers to be a "sophisticated forgery". <sup>[13]</sup> Among those who believe the footage has been altered are researcher Frank Costa, <sup>[26]</sup> Vincent Hallis, <sup>[14]</sup> David Furman, <sup>[15]</sup> former editor of New Inception John K. Fletcher <sup>[16]</sup> and Norman Holt, author of Clipped Wings: The Daedalus Footage Exposed <sup>[17]</sup> who has called it "the biggest hoax, bar none, committed so far this century". <sup>[18]</sup>

Jackie Darvill, who claims to be a former photographic consultant to MI6, argues that there are anomalies in the footage, including "unexplained missing frames or jump cuts, an unnatural jerkiness of movement and changes of focus that you would not associate with an automatic helmet-mounted camera" during certain sequences. <sup>[19]</sup> Harris puts this down to her unfamiliarity with typical human gaits in reduced lunar gravity. <sup>[20]</sup>

Darvill theorises that the jumps preceding frames 341 and 2147 are edits purposefully designed to excise more explicit footage, arguing that a more complete version is still to be found "somewhere in what NASA laughably calls an archive". Her four Freedom of Information (FOI) requests have so far uncovered no new material. <sup>[21]</sup>
